When the Pew researchers asked people about whether or not they believe in heaven, heaven and hell, they were more likely to believe in angels and other higher powers in the past than any other time period. By contrast, they were less likely than a decade earlier to say they believed in anything other than an all-powerful God.. By contrast, the percentage expressing doubt about God has fallen from 19 percent in 2007 to 13 percent in 2012 — two-and-a-half times the rate of decline for those who have a higher-than-average level of belief in God.

Since 2007, the percentage of Americans who express belief in God has risen from 13 percent to 18 percent. Although a number of factors may play a role behind this trend — such as economic progress, increased religious education and more acceptance of same-sex marriage — the evidence suggests that religion is becoming more common among the general American citizenry and that the rise is already starting to slow.. The latest report from the Pew Research Center, released last week, revealed that the United States has become increasingly religious since the 1960s. A recent article in The New America Foundation argued that this trend shows no sign of abating and may even accelerate in the coming decades.. The report, "Rethinking Religious Belief and Practices for the 21st Century." reveals that the rate of Americans who describe their own religious beliefs as normal has been stable at about one-quarter in comparison with previous years..
